All of China Mieville's books seem to have an overarching theme that is illustrated throughout the story, though it is not directly related to the story. In "Perdido Street Station" the theme seems to be the nature of duty and obligation. In "The Scar", the theme is hubris. I think the theme in "Kraken" is the nature of being.

When China Mieville's The Scar — still my favorite book of his — came out, I was working for an over-the-air sci-fi-themed radio show which shall remain nameless. They booked an interview with Mieville, and as the board-op, I called him (I'm guessing at his hotel in Los Angeles or wherever he was), thanked him for being on the show, and potted him up when it was time for him to go on.

Book Review: Kraken by China Miéville | National Post

Kraken utilises Miéville's common setting of London, albeit a strange London. This otherness beside the familiar is a strand in his work evident from King Rat and Un Lun Dun through to THE CITY AND YTIC EHT. This one started out as if it may have been written with a film or TV adaptation in mind - one with a potentially light-hearted take - but soon veers off down strange
